Cotton Prospects for the Year 1865.
It is important as well as interesting to endeavor to form some rough estimate of what is likely to be the position of our great staple manufactured during the year on which we are just entering. What will probably be the state of the market, now as far as the extent of supply of the raw material, the extent of demand for the manufactured article, and how far the two will fall short of affording full employment to the factory population. Of course at this early period of the year, many of the data we make must be conjectural, and our conjectures, we may find are contradicted by unforeseen circumstances which may arise as time goes on, and still we shall probably be able to reach a general idea which will be of service to the capitalist who is considering the prospects for his operations. On the whole the prospects are encouraging—certainly more so than at any period since the American war began.

There was a period in autumn last when there was some ground for a cautious hope that the conduct on the part of the Atlantic was about to cease; but more Federal defeats and disunion, and especially that desolate campaign of Atlanta, the most critical moment of the strife, the taking of the city, and the want of supplies, the loss of 100,000 men, and the want of food, have given us the most serious apprehensions on the part of the Rebels, and some reason to hope that the war will be brought to a close before the end of the year.

Mr. DEAN S. S. I am just in the act of having written to the Secretary of War, to advise him of my opinion.

Private Letter of Gen. Lee.
